Maybe some type of population density vs. complaint reports calculation to arrive at a way to rank the significance of the complaints relevant to the population density.

I am glad to see some action to provide a speedier and more effective response to nuisance odors. I live and work in a neighborhood that has been affected daily by nuisance odors from Swan Island for many years. I would like to suggest that any wording about what constitutes a resolution of nuisance odors be strengthened in the document, e.g. complainants need to agree that the nuisance odors have been abated to their satisfacion before the case is closed.

These seem like appropriate and sound approaches to odor nuisances. Regarding compost odors, a primary problem is the requirement to site composting facilities in Industrial-zoned lands. This places it in urban settings where odor problems are multiplied. The importance of commercial-scale composting is... critical to the fertility of agricultural lands and actually using/enhancing the land Oregon has protected through its land use process. I strongly urge a solution to the type of problem that Recology has in North Plains at the Nature's Needs composting facility (which makes the BEST, most active compost of any provider in the NW) by lobbying the legislature to permit commercial composting on ag lands in addition to industrial lands. It does not smell any worse than a dairy does. (Disclaimer: I

I live in a small town and there is constant air pollution from locals who insist they have a "permit" from local agencies to burn trash in barrels. The enormous quantity of plastic and laminates and chemicals which finds its way into these burn barrels, along with the wood, destroys the local air quality. The overall approach and reasoning appears sound and workable. My concern is that DEQ did not consider any language to address complaints about odors that have persisted for years but are now the recipient of complaints because homes have been built closer to the source or simply because the public is newly aware that they can voice a complaint to a govt. agency. Such cases seem to me to deserve a slower intervention when the complainer has knowingly placed themselves in an area of potential odors and then begun to initiate complaints about them.

See attached.

The proposed strategy appears sound.

I am pleased to see that DEQ is recognizing that odor intensity scale is more practical than olfactometer (scentometer) readings. As someone trained in the use of the scentometer, I agree that an odor can be smelled with the nose and be recognized as offensive, while it is not possible to measure the odor with the equipment.

It is my hope that a compost facility is considered to be different from a recycling facility.

DEQ should ensure that regulatory standards for compost facilities are oriented to the site's proximity to a populated. That is to say a facility near residential properties should be subject to a more rigorous standard than a compost facility miles from a population center.

I believe there should be some type of a distinction of complaints for people who live by the odor as oppose to people who drive by or ride a bike by. Walking by and smelling something does not cause an inconvenience for them other than for a couple of minutes.

Nuisance Report:
1. The proposal seems to be more sympathetic to the source of odor than the population of complainers.
2. Has soft rules and initially is leaving it up to the goodwill and the voluntary action of the source.
3. Priority should be given to close proximity of residence to the source of odor and the repetition of the incident - number of complaints.
4. As far as how to gauge a bad odor, well, bad odor is bad odor, if people are bothered by the odor, then that the source of a particular air pollution problem; that's the DEQ's job. Second: there should be NO threshold of complaint numbers that will set off a real DEQ response. Third: DEQ MUST have more actual investigators and monitoring. Otherwise, the entire burden of proof will be where it is now - on the public (see point number one). I hope this does get off the ground - I'd rather be a resource for a DEQ that is more than a licensing bureau, than a consistently

Thank you for preparing this Proposed Odor Nuisance Strategy so quickly. It appears well thought out, however I am concerned that you may still end up comparing apple to oranges. I am particularly concerned that you do not use the framework you propose as a strict threshold for establishing an air emission as an odor nuisance. If these are used as thresholds then the emissions from Daimler’s paint and Vigor’s acrid machine shop

The result of that evaluation should be taken into strong consideration before the permit is approved.
